THE STORY TELLER

The Dust of Oblivion

By Ella W. Peattie.

(Copyright, 1906, the Author's Executors.)

WHEN I first knew Curzon I could not, for the life of me, make out why his lips had that bitter curve to them. Nor was I able to reconcile his habitual suspicion with the facts of his life, which appeared to me to be very fortunate. He was quite at the head of an interesting English colony out in a certain ambitious western city, and he had an amiable American wife and four fine, energetic, handsome, well-mannered sons. Financially, he enjoyed a great competence, without the harassments of poverty or the responsibilities of riches. He was president of the club, and in the polo team, and he went to cricket and altogether made a miniature England out there on the skirts of Puritanism.

Quite by chance, I saw much of a friend of his one time when I was going over to London. We were steamer acquaintances, and I met Tom Curzon for our one bond. We talked about Curzon a good deal. "So you don't understand the sneer beneath his smile," my acquaintance said in reply to a remark of mine. "Well, I do. I knew him when he was as innocent of a sneer as you are of murder. Perhaps you'd forgive Curzon for the sneer if I were to tell you his story."

"I forgive him for anything he may do," I replied, warmly, "because I like him. But I'd be glad to hear his story. I've hoped Curzon might tell it to me himself, but he never has."

"I've no doubt he'd like to, but there are reasons why he cannot, in honor. I knew him first down at Cape Town. He came there with an engineering corps, and he soon made friends."

"However," it was presently observed that he had some attraction outside of the bachelor circle, and it developed that this was a young girl, a native of Cape Town, and an orphan, who was acting as nursery governess to Mrs. Reginald Henly's children. Mrs. Henly was a connection of mine, and I was good friends with her, and that was how I discovered Curzon's interest in Nannette Averill. She was a lovely girl, and an unusual one. I think she must have been almost six feet tall, quite slender and the very impersonation of grace. The indescribable purity of her appearance in her simple dress, and the flavor in her hair, will always remain with me as one of the sweetest feminine pictures in my somewhat extensive gallery.

But much too true to entertain any idiotic vanity. He wasn't in the least ashamed to have it known that he intended to marry a nursery governess. As soon as he had a right to give that fact out he did so, and he informed everyone that he thought it would be better if Mrs. Averill were saved the fatigue attendant upon her duties, and so he was sending her to his people to stay with what he could come for of his mind.

"You see, he said to me, 'of course dear Mrs. Henly would give her a good send-off—put up a cozy little wadding for her and all that. But after all, it would be a sort of an interjectory affair. I want Nannette to go to the little church where our people have been married for generations past, and I want all our friends to see her there in her white satin and veil according to tradition. She's the most beautiful woman I've ever known, and I must pay tribute to her beauty as well as to her goodness. The poor child has had no social experience, and matter will see to that, you know. I shall take her to London, and have her meet all the country people. It's the sensible thing that I'm doing, though I find it mighty hard to let her go."

"She's traveling quite alone?" I inquired.

"Yes, but my brother Norman is to meet her at Southampton. I've cabled him."

"Curzon had a big job on at that time, and he worked at it frantically. He knew he'd made a name for himself if he got it through successfully. And he was in Paradise all the time, I could see that. His work for the day ever, he gave himself up to day dreams. I suppose he was seeing that little grey-colored church 'at home' and the tall lily-like bride with the old veil that the Curzon brides had worn for generations. I helped make up a case of jewels which was to be taken with him as a bridal gift. We got pearls, principally, and a consignment little Italian jewelry. These made them turn up into the most exquisite necklaces and fillets I have ever seen. Curzon wrote by every steamer. It became a sort of devotion. I almost thought he lost sight of the human qualities of the woman. That white face of hers had enthralled him. He put her on an altar up there in his north country and worshipped her. There was no question about it, he revered her as he would an angel. He came to me one day in the spirit.

"I've just had a letter from my mother," he said, "and she thinks Nannette is the most charming woman she ever saw. She says she's making a great mistake in not bringing her out, so to speak. Everybody was there. Mother dressed her in a silver gauze over blue, and she says Nannette looked like 'moonlight'."

"I couldn't help laughing at him. "Poin, I said, you're uncommonly skilled in making things up, though. He looked ally, and flattered, too. "I was repeating what my mother said," he apologized. Besides, I confess I take an interest in everything connected with Nannette. If you had such a beautiful woman as that belonging to you, I dare say you'd take an interest in the way she was attire, wouldn't you?"

"I admitted that I might. "We heard, too, that Miss Averill was studying French and music and some other things. She became an enthusiastic horse woman and she took up with her social opportunities with enthusiasm. Word came about the troussaints and we were excited about Tom wherever you met him. He was an enviable happy man. He seemed to take an interest in all the incidents of his romance as a girl might, and at the same time his love appealed to him like a religion. Well, it was a day or two before we set off on shipboard, and we each sent a souvenir of Cape Town to Miss Averill. She then sent up a great chest down, and old friend of the girl added their remembrances. We all waited with curiosity to hear the details of the wedding, and the day set for it were quite a sentimental lot. You know how hideously homesick a man gets away at the ends of the earth, like that, and everyone of us drew mental picture of the old hall, and the church, and the people and the beautiful bride, and Tom's innocent happiness. But the cameras came down and brought no mail. At first we thought the Curzons were simply too happy to write, and we didn't expect their secretiveness particularly. But as time went by and still no word came, and no account of the wedding appeared in the society papers which were the next day we began to grow anxious. Finally, our gifts came back to us without comment, and each one was dispatched to New York. Then we knew there had been a tragedy, but the nature of it did not come to us for some time.

"This was what had happened to poor Tom. He reached Southampton in a furor of expectation, his wedding but three days away, and was met by a telegram from his brother. The next thing I heard was that the leading actress—Marie Averill, she was billed—was stricken with a colic, and that she was lying at death's door at the hotel. The paper announced this, with the change of cast. I met Curzon that afternoon and he asked me if I'd seen it.

"I saw it up there at the hotel looking after her," he said.

"Curzon," I cried, "your wife is an angel. I suppose you haven't got out it, have you? You take her for granted, don't you?"

"I don't think I can talk about that," he said. "I didn't beg his pardon. I was too fond of him to let a formal apology intrude itself between us. The next day, meeting him again, he ventured the information that his brother had been killed in a railroad accident in Australia, and that his brother's wife had been on the stage for ten years."

"She has a daughter, the picture of herself," he said. "The daughter is staying with me. I feel sure she doesn't think Nannette can recover."

"I hope not," I thought, but I didn't dare say it.

"I was sure, that once having given up, the woman of many resources could not recuperate. She died in the arms of Isabel Curzon, and she was buried in the Curzon home as Curzon's sister."

"I sat in the hospitable library of the house the evening after the funeral. "I wish," I said, "that I had the right to the uttermost, hadn't she? Your brother paid, too, didn't he? Now put the memory out of your life. The people are dead, and you must make an effort to trust the rest of the world."

He made no answer, but sat there staring at the fire. I saw that the girl of the old party had had her part of him, and no word of the right sort came to my lips. I was casting about me in vain for some argument to offer in protest of his suffering, when the door opened and his wife came in her arm about the waist of a lily-strewn, white-faced, beautiful girl, whose black garments clung to her with a fastidious grace. The girl's hair was gray-blue eyes appealing, and I saw there were glints of gold in them. She had a tender and deprecatory smile, and though her eyes were red, with weeping yet she looked comforted to me. We both arose as the ladies entered, and Curzon stood staring at the two, his lips trembling.

"Tom," said Isabel Curzon, in her strong, clear voice, "I suppose you know that this dear child is our new daughter, don't you?"

Curzon sprang toward his wife and caught her hands and pressed his lips to them.

"Isabel," he said, quite oblivious to the girl to me, "I love you!" The words had all the dramatic force of a first declaration, and I guessed shrewdly that Isabel Curzon had never heard that thing in quite that same tone before. She had won him at last, through many sacrifices. I looked at the girl whose adoption represented the complete grief of this courageous woman, and I felt sure that the sorrows and sins of her mother would never be experienced by her.

"Curzon," I said, "I congratulate you. This child who has just left us will bring you nothing but joy."

"Nothing but joy," he repeated. "She'll be my mother, but yet no like. I'll go to England next month to the old place and take my wife and my children with me—my sons and my daughter."

Display of Innocence.

A Chicago teacher says if he were a girl he would swing Indian clubs and dumb-bells and play golf and tennis. This is all very well, says the Chicago girl, but he'd better be willing to wash dishes, which, of course, shows that he doesn't fully understand the subject.

FALLING HAIR

Save Your Hair with Shampoos of CUTICURA SOAP

And light dressings of CUTICURA, purest of emollient skin cures. This treatment at once stops falling hair, removes crusts, scales, and dandruff, soothes irritated, itching surfaces, stimulates the hair follicles, supplies the roots with energy and nourishment, and makes the hair grow upon a sweet, wholesome, healthy scalp when all else fails.

Assisted by CUTICURA OINTMENT, for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, for cleaning the scalp of crusts, scales, and dandruff, and the stopping of falling hair, for softening, whitening, and healing red, rough, sore hands, for baby rashes, itching, and chafings, and for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery. Millions of Women use CUTICURA SOAP in the form of baths for annoying irritations, inflammations, and excoriations, for too free or offensive perspiration, in the form of washes for ulcerated weaknesses, and for many antiseptic purposes which readily suggest themselves to women and mothers. No amount of persuasion can induce those who have once used these great skin purifiers and beautifiers, to use any others. CUTICURA SOAP contains delicate emollient properties derived from CUTICURA, the great skin cure, with the purest of cleansing ingredients, and the most refreshing of flower odors. No other medicated soap is to be compared with it for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, scalp, hair, and hands. No other foreign or domestic toilet soap, however expensive, is to be compared with it for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery. Thus it combines, in ONE SOAP at ONE PRICE, the virtues of TWENTY-FIVE OTHERS, for the entire skin and complexion save, the most delicate, most beautiful soap in the world.

Complete External and Internal Treatment for Every Humor.

Consisting of CUTICURA SOAP (25c.), to cleanse the skin of crusts and scales, and dandruff, CUTICURA OINTMENT (25c.), to soothe and heal, CUTICURA SHAMPOO (25c.), to purify and refresh, CUTICURA LATHER (25c.), to cleanse and soothe, CUTICURA LATHER (25c.), to cleanse and soothe, CUTICURA LATHER (25c.), to cleanse and soothe, CUTICURA LATHER (25c.), to cleanse and soothe.
